

Dylan started off life as definitely the wrong sort of cross-breed, his mother being a deerhound lurcher, and his father being a miniature dachshund, I know! But I won't go there. Unfortunately Dylan acquired his father's bendy legs and his mothers humped back; how many dogs do you know that has the same length nose and legs!!

Anyway, he had to go in for several operations as we realized that he was badly limping; he has had to have bones broken and reset, eventing in months with pins holding it all in place. After Christmas when he had only just recovered from that operation he got an infection in the stitches on his leg, which for him meant more medicine; but his bone hadn't set, so he had to go back on to the surgical table where he had a pin and wire put in his leg.

The surgeon recommended hydrotherapy, but where he said was a very long way to go and far too expensive. So we had a look on the internet, and after a tiring search found four paws aqua, it was perfect, near and not too expensive.

Dylan is not a very confident dog so when we first introduced him to the water he was less than keen. But after a few sessions he was became more eager, and is now swimming for toys, it's so funny to watch him enjoying himself in the pool. His limp lessened and he's so bouncy now it's lovely to see the sparkle back in his eyes.

Thank you four paws aqua!!
